Abstract

Mycobacterium species are pathogenic to animals and humans. These Mycobacterium species are gram-positive, non-motile, non-spores forming rod-shaped bacteria. The Mycobacterium genus comprises over 190 species, such as Mycobacterium leprae (M. leprae), tuberculosis (TB), Mycobacterium bovis (M.bovis) and many more. These different species of mycobacterium affect the other organs in the body parts. M. leprae mainly invades and affects the skin and Schwann cells. M. leprae is gram-positive and multiplies slowly for 12 to 13 days. Different drug regimens are given to treat leprosy drugs, such as dapsone, rifampicin, and clofazimine. Mycobacterium bovis causes TB in animals and humans. In humans, M.bovis lesions are primarily extrapulmonary and transmitted to humans by ingestion of infected milk and milk products. The treatment of M.bovis involves using antibiotics together, including rifampicin, isoniazid, and ethambutol. Mycobacterium tuberculosis (M. tuberculosis) causes TB, affects the lungs, and attacks other body parts such as kidneys, brain, spine, etc. It is spread through tiny droplets of infected persons. TB can be fatal if not treated; different drug regimens are provided for 3 to 6 months. The most common medication includes isoniazid, rifampicin, pyrazinamide and ethambutol. This review shows other mycobacterium species, their etiology, pathogenesis, and treatment.

Keywords: Mycobacterium tuberculosis, TB, Mycobacterium bovis, Mycobacterium leprae, pathogenesis, etiology, treatment.
